Up on the northern edge of the city, where the houses get bigger and the gardens stretch back towards open fields, roofs tend to be a different job altogether. Thornhill and Lisvane are full of detached homes with hipped roofs, double garages and kitchen extensions added over the years. Redland Roofing Cardiff, a family-owned roofing contractor led by John Owen, works on these properties regularly, heading out from its base in Rumney along Eastern Avenue and up past Llanishen to reach them. A larger detached house usually means more of everything. There are more ridges, more hips, longer verges and a bigger area of concrete interlocking tiles to keep sound. Most homes around here were built with those tiles, and they last well, but the mortar that holds ridge and hip tiles in place doesn't. After a few winters of south-westerly gales it cracks, loosens and lets water in. John and his team can re-bed or replace Click here for info ridge tiles, fit dry verge caps where old mortar verges are crumbling, and add vent covers where the roof space needs to breathe. As experienced roofers in Cardiff, they'll also look at how the tiles themselves are sitting, rather than just patching the one spot you've noticed. Extensions bring their own problems. A lot of rear kitchens, family rooms and garage conversions in Thornhill and Lisvane sit under a flat roof, and many of those were finished in felt that has now blistered roofers cardiff or split. Flat roof replacement is one of the most common themes in the firm's Google reviews. The usual approach is to strip the old covering, lay new tongue-and-groove sterling board decking and finish it with an EPDM rubber membrane, which copes far better with Cardiff's heavy rainfall. Where the extension meets the main house, the lead work and flashings matter just as much, so those get checked and replaced if needed. Conservatory roof replacement is another option for homes where an old polycarbonate roof has turned the room into a greenhouse.
