A roof is the one part of your house you almost never see up close. You hear the drip, you spot the brown stain on the bedroom ceiling, and then you have to trust whoever climbs the ladder. Redland Roofing Cardiff, the family-owned firm run by John Owen from Trecinon Road in Rumney, takes the guesswork out of that moment. On jobs right across the city, from Cathays terraces to semis in Llanishen, John and his team send before-and-after photos and videos so you can see exactly what they found and exactly what local roofers in Cardiff they fixed. It sounds like a small thing, but it changes the whole relationship with your roofer. Customers on Google mention it again and again. They talk about getting pictures of a cracked ridge tile or a slipped slate before any work started, then clips of the finished repair once everything was bedded in and cleaned up. When you can see the problem for yourself, the quote makes sense. There's no wondering whether the work was needed, and no wondering whether it was actually done. Plenty of roofers in Cardiff will tell you what they did. Fewer will show you. The service really earns its keep when you can't be at home. Landlords with student lets and HMOs around Cathays, Roath and Plasnewydd rarely want to stand in a back lane off City Road while a flat roof is stripped. People working in offices near Queen Street or down in Cardiff Bay can't nip home at lunchtime to check progress. One remote landlord, living more than 250 miles away, mentioned in a review that photos arrived throughout the job, which meant the whole thing was handled without a single trip to Wales. The same approach works for a chimney on a Splott terrace, a leaking valley gutter in Adamsdown or a tired felt garage roof in Heath.
