

Florists match flowers to a client's color palette by studying color references, choosing available blooms in related shades, and considering how the flowers will look together. They also account for natural variation, lighting, and the colors of foliage and other materials.

Starting with a clear reference

A florist will usually begin by asking to see the colors a client has in mind. Fabric, paint samples, invitation paper, and photographs can all help, though each gives a slightly different kind of information. A piece of fabric shows both color and texture, while a photograph may be affected by the light in which it was taken.

Names such as blush, rust, or ivory leave room for interpretation. It helps to point out the shades you like and the ones you want to avoid. A client who says blue, for example, might be thinking of a soft gray blue rather than a vivid one.

Choosing flowers within the palette

Once the palette is clear, a florist can look for flowers that fit its main colors and supporting tones. An exact match is not always possible or necessary. Flowers are natural materials, and their colors can shift from the center of a bloom to the edge of a petal. Even flowers of the same variety can vary.

A florist might use several related shades to give an arrangement depth. Foliage matters too: silvery leaves, dark green branches, and fresh green stems each change the way nearby flowers appear. The container, ribbon, and table setting can also influence the finished effect.

Useful details to share include:

- The main color and any accent colors
- Shades that feel too bright, dark, warm, or cool
- The setting and the kind of light it receives
- Any flowers or foliage you especially like

Making room for seasonal variation

Flower availability changes with the season and the supplier. If a particular bloom is unavailable, a florist may suggest another flower with a similar color, shape, or feeling. It is useful to discuss which matters most to you: the flower itself, the color, or the overall look.

Samples can make these choices easier to see. A florist may show you individual flowers or create a sample arrangement, depending on the project. Look at it in light similar to the setting if you can. Colors can look different outdoors, under warm indoor lighting, or beside a strongly colored wall.

Questions to ask your florist

Can you match this color exactly?

Ask for the closest available options and expect some natural variation between blooms.

What happens if a flower is unavailable?

Discuss possible substitutes and agree on which colors and visual qualities should stay consistent.

Can I see the flowers before the event?

Ask whether the florist can share samples or photos, and when those will be available.

Should I bring more than one reference?

Yes. A fabric swatch alongside a photo can help clarify both the shade and the overall mood.

More to read: https://polishcommunitycentre.com/staying-close-from-abroad-sending-flowers-home-to-family/