Motorcycle Accident Lawyer Midland TX Serving West Texas Riders Ask riders around Midland what worries them, and plenty won't mention the open highway at all. They'll talk about the car waiting to turn left. A driver on Wadley Avenue or Andrews Highway looks for other cars, misjudges the speed or distance of a motorcycle, and turns right across its path. The rider has nowhere to go. Left-turn crashes are one of the classic ways motorcyclists get hurt, and they're far from the only one. Riders get rear-ended in stop-and-go traffic on Loop 250 north, clipped by drivers changing lanes on Interstate 20, and caught by gravel, construction zones and blowing sand on rural roads like SH 158. Long, straight stretches around Midland, Odessa and Big Spring tempt drivers to speed, which leaves less time for anyone to react. When a rider goes down, injuries can include fractures, road rash, spinal injuries and head trauma, and recovery can take months. Then there's the bias. Some adjusters, and even some jurors, assume a rider must have been speeding or showing off. That assumption can shape how a claim is handled before anyone looks at the evidence. Texas uses proportionate responsibility, so if the insurer can pin even part of the blame on you, your recovery goes down, and if you're found more than 50 percent at fault, you can't recover at all. That makes the facts matter. Your helmet, jacket, boots and other gear can show you rode responsibly, and the damage to your bike and the other vehicle can tell the story of where each was at the moment of impact.
