Wrongful Death After a Fatal Car Crash in Midland County In 2017, Texas Department of Public Safety data counted 38 fatal crashes in Midland and Midland County, and 50 people lost their lives in them. Behind each of those numbers is a family that got a phone call nobody is ready for. If your family is living through that now, please know that you don't have to sort out the legal side while you are still in shock. There is room to breathe. There is also a deadline, and it helps to understand both. Texas law allows certain family members to bring a wrongful death claim when a person dies because of someone else's negligence. Generally that means the surviving spouse, children and parents of the person who died. They can file together or on their own. If none of them files within a set period, the personal representative of the estate may be able to bring the claim instead. These cases can come from anywhere, whether it's a crash on Interstate 20 east of town, a collision on the Lamesa Highway north of Loop 250, or a late night wreck on an unlit county road where a water hauler or company pickup crossed the center line. Most wrongful death claims in Texas must be filed within two years of the death. That can sound like a long time when you are just trying to get through each week, but a careful investigation takes months. Vehicle data can be overwritten, trucks get repaired and put back on the road, and witnesses move on, especially in an oilfield area where crews rotate in and out. Starting early protects your family's options without forcing any decision before you are ready to make it.
