

A focused landscape enquiry explains the property, intended use and decisions you want help discussing. It gives examples a supporting role rather than allowing a long list of ideas to become the brief.

Lead with the area

Identify the yard design guidance part of the yard being considered and what you want to change about its use. Mention what you want retained. Keep a broad wish for a different appearance separate from a practical requirement that the project needs to address.

Use examples selectively

Choose examples that clarify a particular preference. Explain which detail matters and which parts are unrelated to the enquiry. Ask how the preference might be considered for the actual property instead of requesting an entire picture.

Finish with open questions

List the information you do not yet have about layout, scope or care. Ask which questions need assessment before a proposal can be prepared. Keep the resulting answers with the brief so that the discussion can develop without losing its original purpose.

Keep the next decision clear

Write down the questions that cannot yet be answered. The next conversation can then focus on the information needed, rather than repeating settled preferences or treating a preliminary idea as an instruction.
