

A facial in Las Vegas feels different. The air is dry, the lights are harsh, and the entire city is designed around indulgence. When you finally sink into a dark treatment room off the Strip, with chilled towels and a quiet therapist who remembers your skin type, that hour feels like a necessity, not a luxury.

Then the bill comes. A $100 facial, plus tax. You are relaxed, glowing, and now staring at the blank tip line, wondering: is $10 a good tip for this facial, or will it come off as stingy in a city built on gratuities?

Let's start there, then move into what really matters: how to navigate spa tipping in Las Vegas, how much to tip on more expensive services like a $300 facial or a 90-minute massage, what to do before and after a facial, and how to choose treatments that genuinely help your skin look younger, not just shiny for a night out.

The Heart of It: Is $10 a Good Tip on a $100 Facial in Las Vegas?

Short answer: in Las Vegas, a $10 tip on a $100 facial is the low end of acceptable and will usually read as "bare minimum" rather than generous.

In most U.S. Spa markets, 18 to 20 percent has quietly become the norm for skilled services like facials and body treatments. On the Strip and in the higher-end resort spas, I regularly see guests tip between 20 and 25 percent when they are pleased with the service.

So for a $100 facial:

- 15% tip: $15 (low but acceptable if the service was fine, not special)
- 18% tip: $18 (standard)
- 20% tip: $20 (expected in most resort spas)
- 25% tip: $25 (generous or for exceptional care)

Where does $10 sit? At 10 percent, it signals one of three things to your esthetician: you are on a tight budget, you were not overly happy, or you are not familiar with spa tipping norms. It is unlikely to be viewed as rude, but in Las Vegas, it certainly will not be considered a "good" tip.

If you genuinely loved the facial and you can afford it, $20 is the number that aligns with luxury spa etiquette in that city.

Why Spa Tipping Feels Different in Las Vegas

Las Vegas is built around service culture. Many spa technicians rely heavily on gratuities, just as servers and cocktail staff do. On top of that, resort spas often take a sizable cut of each treatment, so the person touching your skin may be seeing only a portion of the listed price.

Two details matter:

First, a lot of Strip and high-end hotel spas include a "service charge" or "facility fee" that looks suspiciously like a tip but usually is not one. It often goes to the house rather than directly to the esthetician. You have to read the bill. If you see a line that says "gratuity included" and it is 18 to 20 percent, you can add a small extra amount only if the service was extraordinary. If you see "service charge" at 10 or 12 percent, that is not your therapist's tip, and you should still tip on top.

Second, Vegas pricing is itself inflated because of real estate, branding, and the amenities you are using: lockers, steam rooms, lounges with fruit-infused water. The esthetician is not pocketing that premium. A $100 facial in Las Vegas is not the same income for them as a $100 facial in a small suburban spa. Your tip is often where their pay difference appears.

So when you ask whether $10 is a good tip on a $100 facial in Las Vegas, you are really asking: is 10 percent appropriate in a city where 18 to 25 percent is the quiet standard? Not if you want to match the level of service you just received.

How Much Should You Tip for a $300 Facial?

Once you move into advanced facials - think multi-step anti-aging protocols, medical spa treatments, or signature 90-minute experiences - the check can jump dramatically. I often hear people whisper at the reception desk, "How much should you tip for a $300 facial? That is a lot of money already."

For a $300 facial in Las Vegas, 20 percent is still the benchmark, which would be $60. That feels like a lot until you consider what goes into those sessions: advanced training, expensive devices, medical-grade serums, more time, and sometimes prep and post-care planning. If you received thoughtful, expert care, $60 aligns with industry and local norms.

Below it, the text 'BRAZILIAN WAXING LAS VEGAS' is written in large, bold, black capital letters. In the center, there is a square image showing a thick, bright pink wax being pulled from a wooden stick, forming a long, dripping strand. In the bottom left, the text 'SOS WAX And Skincare' is written in bold black, followed by the address '9484 W Flamingo Rd #160, Las Vegas, NV 89147', the phone number '702 907-8070', and the website 'https://soswaxlv.com/brazilian-waxing-las-vegas'. In the bottom right, there is a square QR code.

If your budget truly cannot accommodate 20 percent, 15 percent, or $45, is generally the floor. Below that, you are into "I really didn't like this" territory. When guests tip 10 percent or less on premium services, most technicians assume something went wrong.

Here is a simple way to frame it: if you cannot comfortably tip at least 15 to 20 percent, it may be wiser to book a simpler facial more often rather than a blockbuster treatment once in a while. Your skin will typically look better with consistent, mid-priced facials plus a strong home routine anyway.

What About Peels, Add-Ons, and Medical Spa Services?

People often ask, "Do you tip on a peel?" or "Should I tip when I am seeing a nurse practitioner for injectables?"

In general:

For peels added to a facial, you tip on the total service cost. If your facial is $120 and you add a $30 peel, that is $150, and the 18 to 20 percent guideline still applies.

For standalone chemical peels in a spa setting (non-medical), tipping is standard and follows the same range. The result can be dramatic, but the technician is still, in most cases, a non-medical esthetician earning a service-based wage.

For medical providers in a true medical spa or dermatology clinic - nurse injectors, physician assistants, doctors - tipping gets more nuanced. Many clinics do not allow tips for medical services like Botox, fillers, or laser resurfacing. Some do accept them for non-medical treatments performed by estheticians under the same roof. Always ask discreetly at the front desk. If tipping is not accepted, a handwritten note, a review that mentions your provider by name, or referring friends is the most elegant way to show appreciation.

Salon Tipping: Haircuts, Blowouts, and That $70 Cut

Because many Las Vegas visitors stack spa days with salon visits, the boundaries blur. "Is $10 a good tip for $100 salon services?" or "What is an appropriate tip for a $70 haircut?" come up daily.

For hair, the etiquette mirrors facials:

For a $70 haircut, $12 to $14 (18 to 20 percent) is appropriate. You might go to $15 if your stylist had to rescue a bad job or spent extra time shaping or teaching you styling tricks.

For a $60 haircut, tipping around $10 to $12 keeps you within that same range. If a blowout, gloss, or treatment is added on and the total climbs, calculate on the total amount. Stylists notice when someone tips only on the base cut and ignores the extra hour they spent on color or treatments.

If you are wondering what annoys hair stylists the most, inconsistent tipping ranks surprisingly high, particularly when someone tips lavishly at the bar but becomes rigid in the salon. Communication, respect for their time, and consistency often matter more than the difference between 18 and 20 percent.

Is $40 a Good Tip for a 90-Minute Massage?

A 90-minute massage in a Las Vegas resort can easily run $200 or more before tax and fees. When someone asks if $40 is a good tip for a 90-minute massage, they are implicitly describing a $200 service and a 20 percent gratuity.

In that case, yes, $40 is appropriate. If the massage was exceptional - personalized pressure, attention to problem areas, a sense that you were not rushed out the door - many regular spa guests quietly move to 25 percent for standout therapists they plan to see again.

If your massage cost less, say $150, a $40 tip still communicates strong appreciation. What you want to avoid is a flat number that dips below 15 percent on long services. A $15 or $20 tip on a long massage will almost always read as disappointment.

Preparing For a Facial: What Not to Do Before You Go

Your tip is one way to respect your esthetician. Another is to arrive with skin that has not been booby-trapped by your home routine.

Here are common missteps that make your facial less effective or more risky:

- Do not exfoliate heavily the night before with strong acids or scrubs.
- Do not schedule facial waxing or threading within 24 hours of your treatment.
- Do not use at-home retinol or prescription retinoids the night before, unless your provider specifically tells you to continue.
- Do not get a spray tan shortly before a facial, especially if peels or exfoliation are expected.
- Do not arrive dehydrated, hungover, or with active sunburn from the pool.

That last one is almost a Vegas cliché. There is nothing glamorous about an esthetician refusing to perform parts of your treatment because your face is beet red from the lazy river.

Facials and Retinol: Can I Get a Facial While Using Retinol?

Retinol and its prescription cousins are among the only ingredients that have truly robust evidence for improving fine lines, pigmentation, and overall skin texture. They are also the reason some people walk into a facial thinking their skin is “sensitive” when, in reality, it is just over-treated.

You can absolutely get a facial while using retinol. The key is timing and clear communication. Most estheticians will ask you to stop retinol 3 to 5 days before an advanced treatment that includes strong chemical exfoliation, microdermabrasion, or certain types of peels. For a very gentle hydrating or “sensitive skin” facial, they might be comfortable with a shorter pause.

Should a 60 year old use retinol? Often, yes, as long as the skin can tolerate it and there are no medical contraindications. But it needs to be introduced gradually: twice a week at first, buffer with moisturizer, and adjusted if redness and flaking become persistent. For a 70 year old woman, the approach is similar, though barrier strength and hydration become even more important. Retinol is not a youth fountain in a bottle, but in terms of evidence, it is far stronger than most exotic extracts or trendy actives.

You may have heard claims about products that “work 11 times faster than retinol.” Treat that kind of language with skepticism. No peer-reviewed data supports those precise comparisons on real skin, and those figures almost always come from in-house marketing studies with limited scope.

Choosing the Right Kind of Facial in a Luxury Spa

Staring at a spa menu can feel like deciphering a foreign language. What is the best kind of facial treatment for you? It depends on your concerns.

If your goal is glow for a night out, the most popular facial treatment in resort settings tends to be some kind of hydrating, brightening protocol: thorough cleansing, gentle exfoliation, extractions if needed, a serum infusion, then a mask and massage. It gives you that immediate “camera ready” look.

If your goal is genuine anti-aging, the best facial treatment for over 60 often includes a mix of gentle exfoliation, peptide-rich or growth-factor serums, light collagen-stimulating devices such as LED therapy, and a heavy emphasis on barrier repair. The harshest peels or aggressive microdermabrasion that worked in your thirties or forties may no longer serve you.

When clients ask how to make your face look 20 years younger, I always reframe it. The more realistic aim is to make your face look well rested, well cared for, and congruent with how energetic you feel. In that context, the “what procedure takes 10 years off your face” question becomes less magical and more layered. Combination treatments, not a single wonder procedure, tend to make the biggest difference.

If you are lost staring at the menu and wondering, “How do I know what type of facial to get?” use a simple script at the desk or with your esthetician: describe your skin type in one sentence, your top two concerns in another, and how much downtime you can accept. A good therapist will steer you toward something tailored, not just the most expensive option.

Do You Take Your Bra Off For a Facial?

This question gets whispered to me more often than you might imagine. For a proper spa facial, especially when massage of the neck, shoulders, and décolleté is included, taking your bra off under the robe is more comfortable and makes the therapist’s work smoother. If you prefer to keep it on for any reason, simply say so. They will adjust. Luxury is not about enduring discomfort in silence; it is about having your preferences respected.

What Actually Works: The Essentials of Anti-Aging Skincare

The market is loud. Claims about Japanese secrets to wrinkles, miracle drinks, or the newest facial treatments for 2026 can drown out fundamentals. If you strip out the noise and ask what are the only 4 skin products proven to work for most people, you land on a quiet shortlist:

Cleanser suited to your skin type, sunscreen of at least SPF 30 used daily, a retinoid (if tolerated), and some form of well-formulated moisturizer or barrier repair cream. Everything else is supportive. Vitamin C serums, peptides, niacinamide, and other actives can Men's Waxing Services Las Vegas soswaxlv.com be powerful, but those four anchors do more to slow visible aging than the majority of trendy add-ons.

Which drink is best for anti aging? Realistically, water, with maybe green tea if you enjoy it. Hydration, minimized sugar, and limited alcohol will do more for your collagen than any exotic juice promising to take 10 years off your face. The number one mistake that will make you age faster, visually, is unprotected sun exposure. You can buy every luxury serum in the shop, but if you walk the Strip at midday without sunscreen and spend your afternoons at the pool with minimal shade, you are undoing much of that investment.

Newer Facial and Anti-Aging Treatments: What’s Worth Watching

When people ask about the newest facial treatments, they often want to know what celebrities are doing. There is curiosity around what Jennifer Aniston uses for anti-aging, what celebrities use instead of Botox, or whether high-profile women have had specific procedures.

Here is the grounded reality: many public figures combine tried and tested tools rather than relying on unproven fads. Consistent sunscreen, retinoids, in-office treatments like microneedling or laser resurfacing, neuromodulators such as Botox started at an appropriate age, and sometimes energy-based devices that tighten skin. The age you should start getting Botox, if at all, varies. For many, late twenties to early thirties, when expression lines start to linger, is sensible. Earlier than that is rarely necessary and can sometimes lead people to chase perfection they did not need to change.

If you are exploring what is the best facial for aging, look for treatments that stimulate collagen gently and cumulatively: professional microneedling, certain non-ablative lasers, and well-designed peels spaced appropriately. Many of the new anti-aging treatments projected to dominate 2026 are really refinements of these categories:

better delivery of actives, gentler devices with shorter downtime, and more personalized protocols rather than one-size-fits-all packages.

As for celebrity faces frequently discussed online - questions like what's going on with Goldie Hawn's face, what has happened to Lady Gaga's face, has Taylor Swift had a rhinoplasty, what happened to Goldie Hawn's face, or why Dolly keeps her arms covered - most of what you read is speculation. Reputable professionals do not diagnose from photos or gossip about unconfirmed procedures. It is far more useful, and respectful, to study broad patterns: consistent skincare, skilled makeup, healthy weight maintenance, and, yes, judicious cosmetic work make a visible difference over decades.

Similarly, personal medical information such as what illness Goldie Hawn suffers from, what disability Gaga has, what illness Kim Kardashian has, or whether Celine Dion is able to walk should come only directly from those individuals or their official representatives. Basing your own skincare or treatment choices on rumors about someone else's health is a poor foundation for self-care.

Face Shapes, Beauty Myths, and What Truly Matters

There is no shortage of online chatter about the rarest face shape, the most attractive facial shape, or the seven facial types. These classifications can be fun for makeup and contouring, and stylists sometimes use them when advising on haircuts. But from a skincare perspective, they matter far less than you think.

The rarest face shape is often debated, with some arguing for diamond or triangle shapes. The most attractive facial shape tends to be described as oval in Western beauty norms, with balanced proportions. Yet I routinely see clients who glow after treatments not because their face shape changed but because their skin looks healthier, their expression is softer, and they carry themselves differently.

When someone asks me how to take 10 years off your face or how to take 20 years off your face, my answer almost always includes both skin and behavior: consistent sun protection, a retinoid if appropriate, adequate sleep, lighter alcohol, and stress management show in your features every bit as much as a facial does.

Etiquette, Kindness, and Luxury

Luxury is not just the treatment room design or the product line on the trolley. It is a relationship: you trust your esthetician with your bare face, your insecurities, sometimes your medical history. They respond with skill, care, and often small adjustments that make your experience uniquely yours.

Tipping fairly - whether that is $20 on a $100 facial or $60 on a $300 one - is part of that relationship, especially in a service-driven city like Las Vegas. Arriving prepared, communicating clearly about your home products, being honest about your budget and goals, all of that matters as much as the number you write on the tip line.

If your facial left you feeling cared for, if your therapist answered your questions about retinol, anti-aging, or which facial type suits you best without pushing unnecessary add-ons, respond in kind. In that context, no, $10 on a $100 facial in Las Vegas is not a "good" tip. It is the minimum. When the experience feels anything but minimal, your gratuity should reflect that.
